More than 5,000 school leaders and colleagues attended the three-day summit at the Pennsylvania Convention Center in Philadelphia.

"In the aftermath of a school tragedy, it's important for schools to renew their commitments to take appropriate steps to ensure everyone's safety," said Amy P. Ahart, senior director of NAIS Annual Conference,

Washington, D.C. "We asked Bo to speak at our national conference because schools everywhere are working to improve the safety of their campuses. Bo helped conference attendees ensure they are current and effective in protecting our kids, faculty and staff."

Mr. Mitchell served as a Wilton police commissioner for 16 years. In 2001, he founded 911 Consulting to help campuses, corporations and medical facilities nationwide plan and train for emergencies, disaster recovery and business continuity. Campus clients include Western and Central Connecticut state universities, and secondary schools in Connecticut, New York City and Massachusetts.
